Seymour Ronnold, who was Travin's rival for the affections of the daughter of William Vanderpool, another woodsman, was arrested by a posse in his cabin near Northville, charged with shooting Travin from ambush.

Awakened from sleep by his captors he confessed.

Travin and Ronnold, it is said, had been friends and had worked and hunted together for years. Both fell in love with the same girl, a maid of 20, and the daughter of an aged mountaineer named Vanderpool, known as "Father of the Mountains."

The two men vied with each other in bringing trophies from the forest to lay at the girl's feet. Sometimes one brought a slain deer or the skin of a bear or strange fowls from the earth; again, the horns of an elk, and once the buried treasures of an ancient redskin chief, taken from an Indian mound.

The rivalry was friendly for a long time, and the two men—Travin was 35 and Ronnold 42—wooded the girl in the spirit of big, good-natured boys.

As the girl grew older, however, the affair became more serious. The girl seemed to favor the younger man, and this excited the wrath of Ronnold.

On Wednesday night the two met in Northville, and words led to blows. Travin worsted Ronnold, and then went into the home of a friend. Some minutes later he emerged.

A man lay in wait behind some bushes in the front yard and shot Travin in the back with a shotgun.

Citizens who rushed to the scene saw the slayer dash into the woods. The wounded man lived only a few moments.
